

This work explores my emotional experience of PMS and the cyclical return of the same feelings each month. Using gouache, magazine paper, and cotton, I depict a fallen tree trunk covered with small humanized figures that embody frustration, emotional extremes, and physical pain. New seedlings grow beside the decaying wood, suggesting breakdown and regeneration as part of a recurring biological rhythm. Fungi, plants, and blackberry-like forms reference medication and personal coping rituals (e.g. eating berries for comfort). A layered magazine-paper canopy introduces dimensionality while echoing circular forms throughout the composition, reinforcing the idea of cyclicity.
