

This project aims to reflect on and critique my personal experience of trying to keep all my thoughts and feelings organized, avoiding chaos, and resisting the discomfort of experiences that resist easy categorization. The work is designed to be interactive and playful, mimicking a puzzle game to invite the audience to attempt organizing the components, only to discover that nothing can be perfectly fixed or contained. The piece is made from air-dry clay, wood pieces, thread, wire, and cardboard painted with gouache. The color scheme includes black, white, red, yellow, and green in varying tints and saturations, inspired by the common colors found in children's toys. There are three types of components: clay pieces in black and white with varied patterns and textures, thread and wire forms in triangular organic shapes, and wood squares printed with puzzle-like patterns that have no actual solution. Each type of component can be randomly placed within the cardboard container, and all components except the clay ones are designed to bend and shift shape freely. Overall, this is an interactive installation that invites the audience to engage playfully and to gradually realize that no single component can ever be perfectly fixed or constrained within the container.
